Qualifications

Please describe your relevant analytical skills.

My work as a Ph.D. student at School of Journalism at the University of Texas at Austin and a fellow at UT'S Center for Mexican American Studies requires me to participate in rigorous academic research. On a regular basis, I analyze emerging trends and newly published scientific research in my field. Most of these studies require a line-by-line analysis of the data to ensure my thorough understanding of the findings.

Furthermore, my volunteer service as a board member for Equality Texas puts me in the front line of policy making decisions that affect a statewide organization. The staff at Equality Texas prepare budget and policy reports to guide our decision making. As a board member, I must analyze those reports thoroughly to ensure the proper direction of the organization.

Please describe your ability to be impartial.

My work as a social science researcher takes me to the complicated and complex frontline of human communication. As an academic, I am trained to identify complex human communication phenomenon and construct an ethical, scientific research approach to objectively analyze the issue before me. My training as a social science researcher allows me to review relevant and existing data with an open mind to make appropriate decisions.

Also, my experience as a teaching assistant has further taught me the importance of impartiality. On a weekly basis, I interact with 14 upperlevel division journalism students, all of whom are unique individuals. My success as a teaching assistant and future professor is judged on the success of my students. I must treat my students fairly in order to maximize their opportunity to learn from me. If I wielded my authority in an unfair fashion, I would do a disservice to my students and the university that entrusts me with their learning.

Please describe your appreciation for the City of Austin's diverse demographics and geography.

My involvement with my neighborhood association opened my eyes to the challenges faced by a non-district representative form of government currently in effect in Austin. When moving to Austin in 2010, I immediately joined the Crestview Neighborhood Association. Through my participation with the association and my monthly reading of our phenomenally successful and informative neighborhood newsletter, I learned how Austin neighborhood associations are the site of democracy at its most fundamental and, at times, messy level—neighbors voting on and debating about matters that affect the public spaces directly in front of our homes. Volunteering with my neighborhood association brought me face-to-face with people and families of different religious and political backgrounds. We were unified, not by our personal ideologies, but our love for our neighborhood. However, when trying to get city hall to listen to our concerns, we at times had to "shop around" to find a council member who would take an interest in our issue. This is a minute problem compared to other parts of the city that don't enjoy such an effective neighborhood association. The affluent sections of the city are represented by well-oiled neighborhood associations. Unfortunately, there are parts of this city that remain ignored.

Please provide any other information you wish to be considered during the selection of the most qualified applicants for the Commission.

As one of Austin's LGBT people, I see this city through a different set of eyes. In my community, my friends and loved ones are often times the target of bigotry and hate, which instills in me a desire to make Austin a home to all - not just a place for the affluent and educated. Austin is an exuberant city with boundless natural beauty and abundance of creative energy; however, we often times focus on maximizing the economic gains of a few, instead of rectifying the economic and social injustices faced by the many.
